Kelly,1993-02-02 Much has been written about the housing policies of the Depression and the Postwar period Much less has been written of the houses built as a result of these policies or the lives of the families who lived in them Using the houses of Levittown Long Island as cultural artifacts this book examines the relationship between the government sponsored mass produced housing built after World War II the families who lived in it and the society that fostered it Beginning with the basic four room slab based Cape Cods and Ranches Levittown homeowners invested time and effort barter and money in the expansion and redesign of their houses The author shows how this gradual process has altered the socioeconomic nature of the community as well bringing Levittown fully into the mainstream of middle class America This book works on several levels For planners it offers a reassessment of the housing policies of the 1940s and 50s suggesting that important lessons remain to be learned from the Levittown experience For historians it offers new insights into the nature of the suburbanization process that followed World War II And for those who wish to understand the subtle workings of their own domestic space within their lives it offers food for speculation

The Working Man's Reward Elaine Lewinnek, 2014-04-03 Between the 1860s and 1920s Chicago's working class immigrants designed the American dream of home ownership They imagined homes as small businesses homes that were simultaneously a consumer oriented respite from work and a productive space that workers hoped to control Stretching out of town along with Chicago's assembly line factories Chicago's early suburbs were remarkably socially and economically diverse They were marketed by real estate developers and urban boosters with the elusive promise that homeownership might offer some bulwark against the vicissitudes of industrial capitalism that homes might be better than a bank for a poor man and the working man's reward This promise evolved into what Lewinnek terms the mortgages of whiteness the hope that property values might increase if that property could be kept white Suburbs also developed through nineteenth century notions of the gendered respectability of domesticity early ideas about city planning and land economics and an evolving twentieth century discourse about the racial attributes of property values Looking at the persistent challenges of racial difference economic inequality and private property ownership that were present in urban design and planning from the start Lewinnek argues that white Americans attachment to property and community were not simply reactions to post 1945 Civil Rights Movement and federally enforced integration policies Rather Chicago's mostly immigrant working class bought homes seeking an elusive respectability and class mobility and trying to protect their property values against what they perceived as African American threats which eventually flared in violent racial conflict The Working Man's Reward examines the roots of America's suburbanization in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries showing how Chicagoans helped form

Grasping for the American Dream Nora E. Taplin-Kaguru,2021-07-15 African American homebuyers continue to pay more for and get less from homeownership This book explains the motivations for pursuing homeownership amongst working class African Americans despite the structural conditions that make it less economically and socially rewarding for this group Fervent adherence to the American Dream ideology amongst working class African Americans makes them more vulnerable to exploitation in a structurally racist housing market The book draws on qualitative interviews with sixty eight African American aspiring homebuyers looking to buy a home in the Chicago metropolitan area to investigate the housing search process and residential relocation decisions in the context of a racially segregated metropolitan region Working class African Americans remained committed to homeownership in part because of the moral status attached to achieving this goal For African American homebuyers success at the American Dream of homeownership is directly related to the long standing dream of equality For the aspiring homebuyers in this study delayed homeownership was a practical problem for the same reasons but they also experienced this as a personal failing due to the strong cultural expectation in the United States that homeownership is a milestone that middle class adults must achieve Furthermore despite using perfectly reasonable housing search strategies to locate homes in stable or improving racially integrated neighborhoods the structure of racial segregation limits their agency in housing choices Ultimately policy solutions will need to address structural racism broadly and be attuned to the needs of both homeowners and renters
