

Should Animals Have Rights Or Not?

Throughout history, animals have been used by the humans in various ways: domesticated as loyal companions, served as health minerals, killed for their fur and skins, transportation, performers, fought in wars and sports. There is a debate happening in the world whether animals should have rights or not. Some people say that humans can recognize moral claims and are able to reason. Thus, only humans are being morally considered whereas animals do not need to be morally considered. In this paper, I will refute the argument that animals do not deserve to have rights. This is because both animals and humans seek food and shelter to ensure their survival. Therefore, animals should be granted with rights and to be morally considered. Philosophical views on this issue can be grouped into three general categories: Indirect theories, direct but unequal theories, and moral equality theories.

Indirect theories say that animals are not worthy of moral status. Reason is that animals lack of consciousness, reason or independence. My use of the phrase 'moral status' is according to definition written by Jaworska, Agnieszka and Tannenbaum, Julie, in "The Grounds of Moral Status" which states that an entity has moral status if and only if it or its interest morally matter to some degree for the entity's own sake. Philosophers that formulated arguments in this category are Immanuel Kant (1724-1804), Rene Descartes (1596-1650), and many religious view theories.

Many of philosophers in this category believe that animals do not have rights and we do not need to treat them in a humane way. According to Kant, autonomy means the capacity of an agent to act in accordance with objective morality rather than under the influence of desires. His theory was that both animals and humans have desires that would influence them to make certain decisions to satisfy the desires. However, only humans are capable of resisting their desires and choose which action to take. Since animals lack this ability, they easily comply to their desires, therefore are not autonomous. The humans' ability to evaluate the consequences using moral values is what makes us deserve a very strong moral status.

Another philosopher that agreed that animals do not have rights is Rene Descartes. He denied the animals rights because animals are not conscious. Humans action won't have an effect on unconscious animals. Descartes argues that animals are automata that act as if they ar
