The principal components of the hydraulic power steering control valve assembly are shown in Figure 811 and are listed in Table 811-1. Items are listed in the order in which they are assembled.

Where a single spring control valve is installed on a tractor, the individual components parts are identical. A single spring control valve is shown in Figure 811-1.

The hydraulic circuit shown in Figure 812 is for the variable operation of the control valve. These circuits also show operation of the control valve and the operation of the hydraulic pump. The hydraulic pump is shown in the neutral position.

When starting operation of the control valve on tractors installed with the variable displacement (VLD) hydraulic pump, the same principle of operation applies, but all reference to the control valve should be disregarded.

On tractors with the variable displacement (VLD) hydraulic pump, the oil supply to the control valve is sent to control directly from the hydraulic pump and the load spring valve controls directly to the flow compensating valve of the pump body as shown in Figure 812.

When the control valve is in neutral, the control valve spring is held in the neutral position by the control spring and passage 10 is blocked by the control valve of the pump.

The control valve spring also holds the ball (1) and stop pin (2) from supply passage 10 and return to passage 11 and 12. The ball (1) and stop pin (2) are held in the ball (1) position, therefore, neutral.

When the valve is in neutral position (1) and (2) connect with the return of passage 11 and 12 allowing pressure in the main working line from the valve to return to tank.

On tractors with variable displacement hydraulic pump, the control valve is in the off position, the spring, holding it from the pump back to neutral through the pressure valve assembly.

On tractors with the variable displacement (VLD) hydraulic pump, the flow compensating valve controls the flow of oil to the hydraulic pump.
