Tyler,2003 The idea behind this project was to both gain an understanding of the principles behind infrared data transmission as well as be able to apply this technology to a non typical application The challenge was to use the Motorola MC68HC11 microcontroller to serve as an infrared data receiver as well as to provide the required signals to control a model car A standard television remote control was used as the infrared transmitter The original functionality of the car and the infrared remote were reverse engineered in order to determine the types of signals that were being generated by each An H bridge motor drive circuit was designed to enable the low power microcontroller to control the higher power drive motor Components were added to provide infrared data detection and RS 232 voltage requirements The frame technique and interrupt based software methods were used each with pros and cons and are described in detail The final design proved to be functional but not altogether practical Infrared technology lacks the range to provide adequate control for a moving vehicle A standard television remote however supplies several additional buttons that add to the flexibility of infrared designs Limitations of the infrared receiving circuitry with regard to ambient lighting are also discussed
