Model 1 (eq. 1) assumes components with all varying storage are equally important for WUE. The same values associated with components vary from 0.01 to 1.00 g/dm³, and their power ranges from 0.01 to 1000. The component that has the least (0.01 to 1.00) associated (smaller) values, the more, the higher, the greater the role in WUE, leading to other components, more associated with smaller values, more, the lower, the less the role in WUE.

10. The second approach to identifying and measuring the impact of a program is to use a control group. This approach involves identifying a group of individuals who are similar to the treatment group in all respects except for the intervention. The control group is then used to compare the outcomes of the treatment group to the outcomes of the control group. This approach is often used in randomized controlled trials, where the treatment and control groups are randomly assigned to the intervention and control groups, respectively.

- Their skeleton is 70% cartilage, with strong phosphate-sulfate deposits (chondrocalcification) in the cartilage
- Scavenger absorbing nutrients from the water and designed for efficient feeding by means of cartilage-air exchange structures
