

TO REASSEMBLE

1. Be certain pistol is free of cartridges.
2. Place hammer in horizontal position.

3. Place barrel-receiver on top of frame about one quarter of an inch ahead of its final position and press it backward and downward so that the lug (formed by the top end of the trigger guard) engages the front recess on the underside of the receiver (see Figure 4.) When the rear end of the receiver is just about even with the rear end of the grip frame, the barrel-receiver is properly aligned. If alignment is not achieved by hand pressure, then it is necessary to strike the muzzle of the barrel with a plastic hammer or wood mallet. Maintain pressure in a downward direction on the receiver when striking on the barrel muzzle. CAUTION: Because the barrel muzzle must not be damaged in any way, it is essential that any hammer applied to the muzzle be plastic or wood.

Figure 4

4. Point muzzle up.

5. Pull trigger to be certain hammer is in cocked position and the hammer strut is "free".

6. With muzzle still pointing partially upward, slide bolt (recoil spring upward) into receiver. CAUTION: When sliding the bolt into the receiver, BE CERTAIN that the Firing Pin Stop (Part #A35B, a small pin) is in the bolt. If the bolt is assembled without the Firing Pin Stop in place, the first time the pistol is dry fired (no cartridge in the chamber), the firing pin will be free to move forward to the extent that it will dent the rear face of the chamber, thus rendering the Barrel-Receiver Assembly useless and beyond repair.

7. Point muzzle towards ground and pull trigger so that the hammer falls.

8. Grasp the mainspring housing assembly and press the bolt stop pin (which is a part of it — see Figure 5) upward through the holes in the receiver. As this pin is pushed upward through the grip frame and receiver it also passes through the slot in the bolt and must also pass by the rear end of the recoil spring guide, camming the guide forward to put initial tension into the recoil spring. The best way to accomplish this is to hold the mainspring housing as a handle in one hand and holding the gun in the other, press the pin upward until the tip of the pin protrudes beyond the top of the receiver. Note: During this step be certain that the rear of the bolt is flush with the rear of the receiver and that the hammer is in its fired position. When the hammer is in the fired position it is then possible to observe the hammer strut. That is essential to carrying out the next step.

9. Getting the mainspring housing in place correctly is best achieved in two stages: First, be certain the bolt stop pin is fully inserted, then Second, swing the housing into place and lock as described below. Remember, when the pin is protruding thru the receiver, be certain the upper end of the housing has engaged the ledge inside the lower portion of the receiver. If this engagement is not secure, the housing will pull out when it is swung closed.

10. The mainspring housing is now ready to be swung shut, but it is essential that the hammer strut comes to rest on the mainspring plunger as the housing is closed. Some users find this phase of reassembly is best accomplished by holding the pistol with the barrel generally in a vertical position, but tilted at an angle that causes the hammer strut to drop into the correct position to "meet" the mainspring plunger in the housing.

The mainspring plunger lies inside the mainspring housing and may be seen through the slot in the upper end of the housing. If the hammer strut does not contact the mainspring plunger as the housing is swung shut, it will either be impossible to complete the closure of the housing or the housing may be closed but it will be impossible to draw the bolt all the way back. Note: It is also essential that the hammer itself be in its uncocked, upward position (resting on the firing pin) as the mainspring housing is swung shut.

11. When proper engagement is achieved, closure is completed against tension of the mainspring, which can be felt as the housing is pressed home into the frame.

12. The housing latch may now be snapped shut, completing reassembly. To determine if the assembly has been correctly performed, pull bolt to its rearward position. The bolt should open fully. If it does not, disassemble and repeat step 9, above.

Note: The foregoing description of the reassembly procedure may give the impression that reassembly is difficult, but in reality it is a straightforward operation, once properly learned.

SIGHT ADJUSTMENT

TARGET MODEL: The Target models are equipped with a rear sight that is adjustable for elevation and windage. Each click of the sight adjustment screws (either windage or elevation) will move the point of impact of the bullet approximately 1/4" at a range of 25 yards. The height of the front sight has been set to take best advantage of the elevation adjustment in the rear sight.

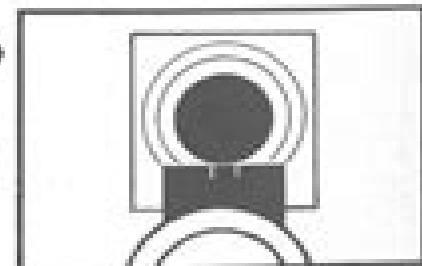

The Elevation and Windage screws on the adjustable rear sight should be turned only with screwdrivers that exactly fit the screw heads. ELEVATION CHANGE: To raise point of impact, turn screw counterclockwise. To lower point of impact: turn screw clockwise. WINDAGE CHANGE: To move the point of impact to the right: turn screw counterclockwise. To move the point of impact to the left: turn screw clockwise.

STANDARD MODEL: In the Standard Model pistol (fixed rear sight), if the gun shoots low, the front sight blade can be reduced in height by careful filing. File off only a small amount and then target the gun. Repeat the filing process until the desired point of bullet-impact is achieved. The rear sight on the Standard Model
