

Position Paper on Social Media

Social media and other interactive online applications are dynamic and constantly evolving dimensions in modern society. These applications often cross public and private domains, inextricably linking both professional and personal lives.

While medical ethics and professionalism are topics that arise at both undergraduate and postgraduate level in medical education, the growth of social media and other technology that facilitates online interaction between individuals is a new and continuously developing environment that requires appropriate education and consideration to ensure a professional approach to its use.

For the medical profession, interaction with these media should always generate the same level of consideration to professional standards as any other public situation, particularly as the online environment is now another channel of information that has the capacity to inform the public perception of the medical profession.

It is often easy to forget or disassociate the online environment from being a public arena, particularly while it may just be you using your PC, smartphone or tablet. However, you should always be mindful that the content you generate on sites can reach a public domain regardless of your intention for the information to be public or private.

This guidance is aimed at doctors and medical students who interact with social media and other online platforms both professionally and personally to remain fully aware of the both the positive and negative implications of their online actions. Doctors and medical students can certainly enjoy using social media and other interactive applications in both their professional and personal lives; however this guidance aims to promote consciousness about possible conflicting situations and considerations to professionalism in their interaction with such platforms.

There are obvious benefits to employing the use of social media and other interactive online applications.

- Medical Education: As the delivery of medical education advances with the improvements to online education systems, doctors and medical students may utilise online applications that are easier to access and more practical to their working requirements which may include accessing seminars online; online knowledge assessments or even CPD/CME activities. Online journals and medical forums along with blogs are all increasing to help progress debates and provide alternative information sources for doctors and medical students.
- Professional Networking: Online professional networking is becoming more and more prevalent, and has the possibility to extend over geographical boundaries that may have previously hindered networking. Doctors with specialist interests may link with colleagues around the world, and employment and training opportunities can reach a wider audience.
- Patient benefits: Doctors can refer to reputable online resources and support sites for particular disease groupings, relative support and other informative resources.
- Personal: As a communication and personal networking tool, social media has many benefits to the individual, and can be accessed at any time of day or night. Many people access and develop interests online, particularly given the mobility of technology where individuals can access online platforms from a variety of electronic tools.

The Crossover: When Private Becomes Public

While there are clear benefits to using social media, there can be unintended consequences when your private life suddenly becomes public. While you should always check your security settings (and ensure any updates do not impact on your settings), you should never rely on such settings to be absolute, as there is always the possibility that these can be breached. Therefore, you should always consider the potential professional implications of the content that you post. Remember that regardless of intention, social networks and interactive online applications are made for sharing
