

likely means that a storm is right behind it. He hastily tries to stow the sails and his supplies in the cabin below, but the storm comes upon him too quickly. In his struggle to secure the Frog, he is knocked unconscious by the boom of the mast and falls into the cabin.

David drifts in and out of consciousness over the next day. When he finally awakens, the storm has subsided and the Frog is a mess. Thankfully, there is no significant damage, but David realizes that he has been blown completely off course. Without proper maps or navigation gear, he is completely lost. He attempts to remain calm and to take stock of his supplies. He knows that he will need to use everything at his disposal to get home. On the first night after the storm, David is awakened by something bumping and scraping against the boat. He goes on deck to investigate and realizes that a shark is throwing itself against the hull. He begins to panic again but reminds himself that the shark is acting on instinct, not malice.

The next day, David continues to put the ship back in sailing form, although he is unable to sail anywhere due to the lack of wind. Time passes, and eventually, David is nearly hit by a passing oil tanker. He attempts to get the tanker's attention, but the crew does not notice him. This encounter causes David to feel great anger, which motivates him to work on the problem of how to return home. Eventually, the wind strengthens, and David can sail the Frog due east, back to the coast. While sailing, he is surrounded by a pod of killer whales and watches them with both fear and awe. They swim onward past the Frog and David nearly runs aground on a nearby shore. He is dismayed to learn that he has not made it back to the Southern California coast; instead, he is just offshore on a stretch of uninhabited land. He guesses that it is probably Baja California. David sails the Frog into a natural cove and falls asleep. He is roused from his slumber by a pod of blue whales. He watches them all day as they swim and breach. After they leave, David decides to set sail again as well.

David sails Frog into another strong storm, but this time he is ready. David has gained a great deal of skill as a sailor and feels more courageous. He successfully navigates the Frog over the swells and through the storm. After it subsides, David encounters a whaling research ship. They inform him that everyone back in his hometown has been searching for him and that he has been presumed dead. The captain offers David safe passage back to Ventura but informs him that he will have to leave the Frog behind. David refuses, having developed a strong bond with his boat. He decides that he and the Frog will sail back home together. The crew of the research vessel provides him with ample supplies and wishes him well. David and the Frog set a course for the north and head home.
