

Function check with diagnosis instrument

General information

When the control unit receives system voltage, the control unit checks the system. There is a service/diagnosis instrument for the EEC system, to read the results of checks for diagnosis and function checking. The instrument makes it easier to quickly localize and fix any faults in the EEC system.

Diagnosis instrument

The instrument has a window (1) where menus for displaying fault codes, sensor values and input/output signals are displayed. The menu can be supplemented and modified, such as other languages in the menu, by just changing the contents (2) which contains the instrument software.

There are three buttons under the instrument display: two arrows (4) (2) and (4) (3) and an Execute button (4) (1) which corresponds to "Enter" on a computer.

Connection of diagnosis instrument

Connection

The instrument is connected to a connector on the instrument panel.

The installer is responsible for ensuring that this connector is wired in.

Connect the red and black clamps in the diagnosis instrument cables to the positive (+) and negative (-) terminals on the engine electrical system, or another power supply (24 V).

Sensor, coolant, charge air, fuel temperature and charge air pressure

Coolant temperature sensor (12)

The sensor, which is located in the thermostat housing, gives the control unit information about engine coolant temperature. This consists of a non-linear resistor, whose resistance is highly dependent on the temperature of the resistor body. The resistance falls as the temperature rises.

Charge air temperature sensor (20)

The sensor is located underneath the intercooler on the right side of the engine. This consists of a non-linear resistor, whose resistance is highly dependent on the temperature of the resistor body. The resistance falls as the temperature rises.

Fuel temperature sensor (21)

The sensor is located inside the fueling leg on the control unit to the line fuel filter.

The fuel flows from the filter head, via the fueling leg and on through the filter, back into the system. When the fuel passes the fueling leg, the sensor provides information about current fuel temperature to the control unit. The fuel also cools the control unit to a certain extent.

The sensor consists of a non-linear resistor, whose resistance is highly dependent on the temperature of the resistor body. The resistance falls as the temperature rises.

Since the sensor is integrated into the control unit, it can not be replaced separately, the entire control unit must be changed if necessary.

Charge air pressure sensor (22)

The sensor, which is integrated into the control unit, senses the charge air pressure via an air pressure pipe, which is connected between the inlet manifold and the Turbopipe underneath the control unit. The sensor measures absolute pressure, which is the sum of charge pressure plus atmospheric pressure.

Since the sensor is integrated into the control unit, it can not be replaced separately, the entire control unit must be changed if necessary.
