1. Ideally, the nasal septum will divide the nasal cavity equally, but it is common for this partition to be slightly off center. A deviated septum, however, is a condition in which the nasal septum is shifted significantly away from the midline. Explain how this abnormality may cause difficulty in breathing.

Deviated septum would not allow a divider for moving the air into where the septum was shifted would be partially blocked so less air would enter from that side.

2. The configuration of the conchae and meatuses forms irregular twists and turns along the wall of the nasal cavity. What do you think is the functional advantage of this arrangement?

Arrangement of the conchae and meatuses cause the inhaled air to twist against the meatus, allowing particulate matter to be trapped by the meatus and the air to be warmed and humidified.

3. Complete the following table.
