Therapeutic drug monitoring (TDM) is the measurement of drug concentrations in biological fluids (usually plasma or serum) to ensure that the drug concentration is within the therapeutic range. TDM is used to optimize drug therapy in patients who are receiving drugs with a narrow therapeutic index (NTI) or who are at risk of toxicity or subtherapeutic response. NTI drugs are those drugs for which the difference between the therapeutic and toxic concentrations is small. Examples of NTI drugs include digoxin, theophylline, and lithium. TDM is also used to monitor drug concentrations in patients who are receiving drugs with a wide therapeutic index (WTI) to ensure that the drug concentration is within the therapeutic range. Examples of WTI drugs include penicillin and aspirin. TDM is performed by measuring the drug concentration in a biological fluid (usually plasma or serum) at a specific time point. The drug concentration is then compared to the therapeutic range to determine if the drug concentration is within the therapeutic range. If the drug concentration is outside the therapeutic range, the drug dose may need to be adjusted. TDM is a valuable tool for optimizing drug therapy in patients who are receiving drugs with a narrow therapeutic index or who are at risk of toxicity or subtherapeutic response.

The following study was an attempt to determine the effectiveness of the new computer-aided, interactive, self-paced course in teaching the principles of ergonomics. The course was evaluated by comparing the performance of two groups of students: one group received the course and the other group did not.
