DESIGN: Cross-sectional survey.

SETTING: A large, multi-site, population-based survey of the United States.

PARTICIPANTS: A nationally representative sample of 10,000 adults.

The association was strongest for individuals with a mental health disorder who also had a physical health condition.

CONCLUSIONS: The study suggests that individuals with a mental health disorder are more likely to receive a health care service than those without a mental health disorder. This finding has implications for the development of policies and programs to improve the health care of individuals with a mental health disorder.

KEY WORDS: Mental health disorder, health care service, cross-sectional survey.

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this study was to examine the association between the presence of a mental health disorder and the receipt of a health care service. The study was conducted using data from a large, multi-site, population-based survey of the United States. The study found that individuals with a mental health disorder were more likely to receive a health care service than those without a mental health disorder. The association was strongest for individuals with a mental health disorder who also had a physical health condition.

The study has several strengths. First, the study used a large, multi-site, population-based survey of the United States, which increases the generalizability of the findings. Second, the study used a cross-sectional design, which allows for the examination of the association between the presence of a mental health disorder and the receipt of a health care service at a single point in time. Third, the study used a nationally representative sample of adults, which increases the external validity of the findings.

There are several limitations to the study. First, the study used a cross-sectional design, which limits the ability to establish a causal relationship between the presence of a mental health disorder and the receipt of a health care service. Second, the study used a self-reported measure of the receipt of a health care service, which may be subject to recall bias. Third, the study did not control for all potential confounding factors, such as socioeconomic status and access to health care.

In conclusion, the study suggests that individuals with a mental health disorder are more likely to receive a health care service than those without a mental health disorder. This finding has implications for the development of policies and programs to improve the health care of individuals with a mental health disorder.
