

SACK'S SENTENCE COMPLETION TEST

By: Joseph M. Sacks

I. INTRODUCTION

A sentence completion test consists of a number of incomplete sentences presented to the subject for completion; for example, "I get angry when ..." Usually there are no instructions except complete these sentences as rapidly as you can. Don't stop to think about it, but say the very first thing that occurs to you. The test is usually not a standardized test and is rarely treated quantitatively. It may be administered to a group or as an individual test. It requires a minimum of supervision and this fact may be an important consideration in many clinical situations.

Since that time, sentence completion methods have become increasingly more popular and the sentence completion has become a regular part of standard clinical test batteries.

These two features of flexibility and economy seem to have been of paramount importance in gaining the sentence completion the wide popularity it enjoys. Tundberg (1961) found that, of all the psychological tests and instruments, the sentence completion ranked 13th in frequency of use, and among the group personality instruments the sentence was second only to HNPI.

The flexibility and popularity of the method have led to a proliferation of sentence completion forms, the original of which are often obscure. The sentence
