8.6 FLOW-ORIENTED MODELING

Data flow-oriented modeling continues to be one of the most widely used analysis notations today.<sup>13</sup> Although the data flow diagram (DFD) and related diagrams and information are not a formal part of UML, they can be used to complement UML diagrams and provide additional insight into system requirements and flow.

The DFD takes an input-process-output view of a system. That is, data objects flow into the software, are transformed by processing elements, and resultant data objects flow out of the software. Data objects are represented by labeled arrows and transformations are represented by circles (also called bubbles). The DFD is presented in a hierarchical fashion. That is, the first data flow model (sometimes called a level 0 DFD or context diagram) represents the system as a whole. Subsequent data flow diagrams refine the context diagram, providing increasing detail with each subsequent level.

The purpose of data flow diagrams is to provide a semantic bridge between users and system developers.<sup>14</sup>

Element Editor

Some will suggest that the DFD is "old school" and has to play a modern jacket. But it still does include a previously useful model of representation at the analysis level. If it can help, use the DFD.

8.6.1 Creating a Data Flow Model

The data flow diagram enables the software engineer to develop models of the information domain and functional domain at the same time. As the DFD is refined into greater levels of detail, the analyst performs an implicit functional decomposition of the system. At the same time, the DFD refinement results in a corresponding refinement of data as it moves through the processes that embody the application.

A few simple guidelines can aid immeasurably during derivation of a data flow diagram: (1) the level 0 data flow diagram should depict the software/system as a single bubble; (2) primary input and output should be carefully noted; (3) refinement should begin by isolating candidate processes, data objects, and data stores to be represented at the next level; (4) all arrows and bubbles should be labeled with meaningful names; (5) information flow continuity must be maintained from level to level;<sup>15</sup> and (6) one bubble at a time should be refined. There is a natural tendency to overcomplicate the data flow diagram. This occurs when the analyst attempts to show too much detail too early or represents procedural aspects of the software in lieu of information flow.

13. Data flow modeling is a core modeling activity in structural analysis.

14. That is, the data objects that flow into the system or any transformation at one level must be the same data objects (or their constituent parts) that flow into the transformation at a more refined level.
