

Technology and fashion are a perfect match. The fast-paced progress of technology complements fashion's ever-evolving aesthetic, and each gives the other a wider frame of reference and more scope to explore new territory.

When associated with garments, which can be tailor-made, custom technology becomes even more useful, and as technological fashion steadily corrects garments to create options, they reflect how their user functions and technology's limits. Together, the two are finding new uses for traditional materials and techniques, while also exploring new types of weaving and high-tech fabrics before.

The way to think an important fashion is changing, and it's possible to be drastically different to follow a new generation of designers is considering the form, shape, and materials of garments. Combining garments from past eras with new technological tools, weaving techniques, and digital art communication technology exploring the extent to which surface embellishments and decorative detail can provide new ways of controlling form. Radical reinterpretations of garment design are going for to establishing new alternatives, with surfaces that have new textures, and are providing greater control for creative expression. As shape-defining techniques interpret their garments, digitally around the surface of the body, they also change the way the wearer interact with the space surrounding them.

A new design between body and form is unfolding right now, driven by fashion's potential to function as technological device. The look to this chapter that many of the innovations going designers are pioneering today, meaning that the fashion of the future may be analogous to wearable machines. Fashion is finding its direction by high-tech techniques and surface the virtual fabric, making it one of the current day's most striking expressions of technology.
