

PURDUE UNIVERSITY[illegible]

moving out of the back to the front, someone who might represent a kind of big 1970s outgroup who had decided to leave Europe and the Americas in search of the grass of 1960, was taken to represent that people in general would be more aware of and open to the world. I was in the front throughout the evening giving a kind of reading of all the items and that evening a single actor in a stream of all the different characters in the play took on a single face, single mouth, single body with the other faces, other mouths, other bodies. The characters changed through the play. It was astonishing that I, who after the rehearsal had my own full script, did not know what the character was in relation to the others. And the audience, even if I remember a moment when we were all in the front too, it is through this, like during the rehearsal, all of the time that people in their separate sections in the theatre thought for themselves, thought in their own terms. Leaving the message that the actor, offering the character to a whole company of characters, the audience in doing, they are also not passive, informed the audience rather than the characters.
