Exact Algorithms for Constraint Satisfaction Problems Robin Alexander Moser, 2013 The Boolean satisfiability problem SAT and its generalization to variables of higher arities constraint satisfaction problems CSP can arguably be called the most natural of all NP complete problems The present work is concerned with their algorithmic treatment It consists of two parts The first part investigates CSPs for which satisfiability follows from the famous Lovasz Local Lemma Since its discovery in 1975 by Paul Erdos and Laszlo Lovasz it has been known that CSPs without dense spots of interdependent constraints always admit a satisfying assignment However an iterative procedure to discover such an assignment was not available We refine earlier attempts at making the Local Lemma algorithmic and present a polynomial time algorithm which is able to make almost all known applications constructive In the second part we leave behind the class of polynomial time tractable problems and instead investigate the randomized exponential time algorithm devised and analyzed by Uwe

Schoning in 1999 which solves arbitrary clause satisfaction problems Besides some new interesting perspectives on the algorithm the main contribution of this part consists of a refinement of earlier approaches at derandomizing Schoning s algorithm We present a deterministic variant which losslessly reaches the performance of the randomized original If "2009"?
