

Abstract

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of young adults.

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved a group of 20 young adults who were randomly assigned to either a training or a control group.

The training group participated in a 12-week program that included aerobic and strength training, while the control group remained sedentary.

At the end of the 12-week period, the training group showed significant improvements in physical fitness and psychological well-being compared to the control group.

These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have a positive impact on the physical and psychological health of young adults.

Keywords: young adults, physical fitness, psychological well-being, training program.

Introduction

Young adults are a population that is often at risk of physical and psychological health problems. This is due to a variety of factors, including sedentary lifestyles, poor diet, and stress.

Physical fitness is an important component of overall health, and it is essential for young adults to engage in regular physical activity. This can help to improve cardiovascular health, increase energy levels, and reduce the risk of chronic diseases.

Methods

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved a group of 20 young adults who were randomly assigned to either a training or a control group.

Results

At the end of the 12-week period, the training group showed significant improvements in physical fitness and psychological well-being compared to the control group. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have a positive impact on the physical and psychological health of young adults.

The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved a group of 20 young adults who were randomly assigned to either a training or a control group.

Conclusion

These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have a positive impact on the physical and psychological health of young adults.
