

ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE

1960:-

By the middle of the 1960s, research in the U.S. was heavily funded by the Department of Defense and laboratories had been established around the world. AI's founders were profoundly optimistic about the future of the new field: Herbert Simon predicted that "machines will be capable, within twenty years, of doing any work a man can do" and Marvin Minsky agreed, writing that "within a generation .

By the 1960's, America and its federal government starting pushing more for the development of AI. The Department of Defense started backing several programs in order to stay ahead of Soviet technology. The U.S. also started to commercially market the sale of robotics to various manufacturers. The rise of expert systems also became popular due to the creation of Edward Feigenbaum and Robert K. Lindsay's DENDRAL. DENDRAL had the ability to map the complex structures of organic chemicals, but like many AI inventions, it began to tangle its results once the program had too many factors built into it... the problem of creating 'artificial intelligence' will substantially be solved". The same predicament fell upon the program SHRDLU which would use robotics through a computer so the user could ask questions and give commands in English.

In the early 1980s, AI research was revived by the commercial success of expert systems, a form of AI program that simulated the knowledge and analytical skills of one or more human experts. By 1985 the market for AI had reached over a billion dollars. At the same time, Japan's fifth generation computer project inspired the U.S and British governments to restore funding for academic research in the field. In the 1990s and early 21st century, AI achieved its greatest successes, albeit somewhat behind the scenes. Artificial intelligence is used for logistics, data mining, medical diagnosis and many other areas throughout the technology industry

1990 :-

From 1990s until the turn of the century, AI has reached some incredible landmarks with the creation of intelligent agents. Intelligent agents basically use their surrounding environment to solve problems in the most efficient and effective manner. In 1997, the first computer (named Deep Blue) beat a world chess champion. In 1995, the VaMP car drove an entire 158 km racing track without any help from human intelligence. In 1999, humanoid robots began to gain popularity as well as the ability to walk around freely. Since then, AI has been playing a big role in certain commercial markets and throughout the World Wide Web. The more advanced AI projects, like fully adapting commonsense knowledge, have taken a back-burner to more lucrative industries.
