

Figure 3.10. Geographic distribution of accommodation scheme variation.

Additionally, scheme variation within states occurs in addition to variation between states. Nevertheless, many factors are involved in this case, including whether a particular utility is located within certain access control or region type and what appurtenances are entailed.

What Type of Utilities Is Charged by DOTs?

There are many types of utilities that are installed along ROW. As part of this research, telecommunications facilities (cell towers, broadband/fiber optics, and small wireless facilities) as well as electric, gas pipelines, and waterlines, among others, were considered. The compensation and valuation approaches vary along these utility types. Figure 3.11 and Figure 3.12 show that for telecommunication facilities, cell towers, small wireless facilities (SWF), broadband/fiber optics (FO) (30%, 52%, and 32%, respectively) are the most frequently charged utilities by state DOTs compared to the general permit fees (36%) of other utility types.

A few states noted that they receive compensation from electric lines or gas pipelines. Generally, these state DOTs treat all utilities equally, whether they are fiber-optic, electricity transmission, or gas lines.

3.2 Summary

There are various degrees of authority given to utilities regarding accommodating their lines and facilities on public ROW that differ for each state. According to state laws and regulations, DOTs also have different approaches to charging accommodation fees. There are numerous factors contributing to these variations, including the complexities of each state's legislation, the complex makeup of its population, the varied access control of its roadways, and the various ways in which land is valued.
