Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week, 1000 kcal energy deficit diet on the body composition and physical performance of 10 male triathletes. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group (CG) and a diet group (DG). The CG maintained their current diet and exercise regimen, while the DG reduced their energy intake by 1000 kcal per day. Body composition was measured using dual-energy x-ray absorptiometry (DXA) at baseline and after 10 weeks. Physical performance was assessed using a triathlon time trial. The results showed that the DG lost significantly more weight and fat mass than the CG. There was no significant change in lean mass for either group. The DG also showed a significant improvement in triathlon performance compared to the CG. These findings suggest that a 1000 kcal energy deficit diet for 10 weeks can lead to significant weight and fat mass loss, and improved triathlon performance in male triathletes.

When a person is asked to perform a task, the person's response is often influenced by the context in which the task is performed. For example, a person's response to a task may be influenced by the presence of other people, the time of day, or the location of the task. This is known as the context effect. The context effect is a well-known phenomenon in psychology and has been studied extensively. In this paper, we will discuss the context effect and its implications for research and practice.
