Tenth Grade Reading Comprehension 12: The Missing Painting

Detective Jackson was on the case of the missing painting. It had been stolen from the museum the night before, and everyone was on edge. The painting was worth millions of dollars, and they knew that whoever had taken it was a professional.

Jackson arrived at the museum and began to investigate. He looked for any signs of forced entry, but the windows and doors were all locked tight. He spoke to the security guard, but he didn't have any useful information. As he was about to leave, he noticed something strange. The security camera in the hallway outside the room where the painting had been hung had been turned off. Jackson knew that this was no coincidence. Someone had intentionally turned off the camera to avoid being caught on tape. Jackson decided to start his investigation by talking to the museum staff. He questioned everyone who had been working the night before, but no one had seen or heard anything unusual. He even brought in a sketch artist to create a composite of the thief, but there were no leads. Days turned into weeks, and Jackson was no closer to solving the case. He had hit a dead end, and he was beginning to think that the painting was lost forever.

And then, out of nowhere, a man walked into the police station with the missing painting. He claimed that he had found it in a dumpster behind a local restaurant. The police were skeptical, but they confirmed that the painting was, in fact, the one that had been stolen from the museum.

The man refused to give his name, but he did tell the police one thing: he had seen someone else put the painting in the dumpster. He gave them a description of the man, and Jackson knew that this was his chance to solve the case. He searched through the police database and found a man who matched the description. It turned out that he was a disgruntled former employee of the museum who had been fired a few weeks earlier. Jackson brought him in for questioning, and after some intense interrogation, the man finally confessed to stealing the painting.

The case was solved, and the painting was returned to the museum. Jackson was hailed as a hero, and the museum staff was grateful for his hard work. But Jackson knew that he couldn't have solved the case without the help of the anonymous tipster. He hoped that someday, that person would come forward so he could properly thank them.

Questions:

1. What was stolen from the museum?
2. What did Detective Jackson notice that was strange?
3. How did Jackson start his investigation?
4. How was the painting found?
5. Who turned out to be the thief?

Summary question:

How did Detective Jackson solve the case of the missing painting, and what role did the anonymous tipster play in the investigation?
