

Can Themba: Forbidden love

Can Themba (South Africa) was born in Pretoria in 1924, and named Canodoise Daniel. He studied at the University of Fort Hare, and taught in Johannesburg's western township areas before becoming a Journalist on the Drum magazine, and later at the Golden City Post. He was declared a banned person in South Africa, which meant severe political and social restrictions were placed upon him and his works. Leaving South Africa, he taught in Swaziland where he died in 1968. His short stories, collected and published after his death, offer a humanistic view of life in Sophiatown before the suburb was destroyed under the provisions of the Group Areas Act in 1955.

The apartheid government's prohibitions on mixed relationships were often reflected in social tension, creating "Romeo and Juliet situations", where people were involved with members of other races against the wishes of some family members. This story reflects such a situation. In the background the reader can also discern the apartheid government's practice of classifying people, sometimes finding more than one race in the same family. In this story racist attitudes often stem from fear or from self doubt. Themba depicts three humanistic woman characters, and one young man, who stand against the fear and hatred that causes people to gang together to bully others.
