THE ADVENT OF THE DICTIONARY

A very basic requirement for anybody who wants to study the English language is without doubt a copy of a good dictionary. Nowadays, acquiring a dictionary is not a very difficult task. All it involves is a trip to one's nearest bookshop where a healthy selection is bound to be available. However, people don't appreciate that a few hundred years ago this would have been out of the question.

It is less than six hundred years since the first attempt at compiling a dictionary of the English language was made. However, the advent of the first dictionary goes even further back in time than that. [1] [F] The actual dictionary consisted of clay tablets engraved with cuneiform writing, a primitive form of written language.

The Greeks and the Romans also produced lexical lists such as Apollonius' glossary of words and phrases used by Homer. The first alphabetically ordered glossary was put together by Verrius Flaccus in Rome around 2000 years ago. [2] [G]
