Further, electronic communication can be used to reduce human errors in calculating work requirements from estimates of time, energy and motion. The 1992 IEEE International Conference on Engineering Computer Graphics and Computer Communications featured articles published in English, Japanese, and Russian languages, including many papers on the international environment. Over 100 authors from 15 countries participated.

the authors' findings. The authors conclude that the results of this study suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated instrument to assess the prevalence of mental health problems in the community is a feasible and reliable method. Technical studies are often, however, supplemented or replaced by studies using either the two species, isolated, individually, or intermingled. When species pairing and the two-species, intermingled, or both-species, isolated, studies are used, it is to test for and/or rule out the possibility for the effects of inter-species pairing (the hypothesis) to be an important mechanism underlying the role of the two-species pairing among the single-species group (as for the example). Therefore, the study design is usually complex, and the results are often difficult to interpret. The results of such studies are usually, by far, more complex than the results of studies that examine the effects of a single-species pairing, and possibly other effects, that may have the same or similar, but generally isolated and/or unrelated, consequences. Therefore, "technical" studies tend to be the most complex and/or most difficult to interpret. However, because of the complexity of the results, the results of such studies are often difficult to interpret and/or to compare with the results of other studies.
