Upon graduating high school, my long term goal was to stay close to home and major in Agriculture, something that would enable me to carry on the family business. Coming from a largely rural area, my parents encouraged me to attend college, but always stressed the importance of supporting the community. For many generations, our town has been highly reliant on agriculture, and not much has changed since the time of my grandparents. This was the mindset with which I entered St. John's College, a regional school located just twenty minutes from my home. I thought that this would enable me to help at home while pursuing a dutiful career in something that I had been brought up to do.

Everything changed one day when I took a computer science course in order to fulfill a graduation requirement. I had selected the class on a whim, hoping that it would give me better insight as to how to unleash the full potential of my Android phone, but nothing more. What resulted was me requesting to take additional computer programming courses, and engaging in self-study when none more were available. It was a very scary experience to explain to my parents that I no longer wanted to study Agriculture, and that computer science was a field that both interested and felt natural to me. Ultimately, they were supportive of my decision, and I hope to be able to transfer to a college that offers a stronger computer science program so that I can continue my education in the field. As a leader in technological studies nationwide, Stonyfield University offers a strong computer science program perfect for students that already possess a good amount of credits in the field. I look forward to learning from expert programmers and industry professionals, incorporating not only their knowledge of computer science, but also their advice for success. Continuing in the field of computer science is very important to me, which is why I have also gained many skills through self-study. A Computer Science degree from Stonyfield University would enhance my current skillset and prepare me for a career in the industry ahead.
