

Nonessential amino acids can be created by the liver or (11)Matching complete and incomplete proteins.*Chapter 5: Fats

- What is the major function of triglyceride in food and physiologically in the body?

Food functions: Triglycerides

- Triglycerides provide food functions of energy, palatability, safety, food processing, and source of nutrients.
- Source of energy
- Palatability: fat makes food smell and taste good
- Satiety and satiation: fat helps prevent hunger between meals. Fat slow down digestion because of the hormones released in response to its presence in the GI tract, causing us to feel full and satisfied->satiety. Satiation occurs during, not after eating. Satiation tends to increase our desire to eat more fatty food, not less.
- Food processing: emulsifier- a substance that works by being soluble in water and fat at the same time. Lecithin, a phospholipid, has an extensive role as an emulsifier
- Nutrient source
 - ✓ Contain and transport fat-soluble vitamin A D E K
 - ✓ Contain and transport essential fatty acids (linoleic and linolenic: essential)

Physiologically functions:

- Stored energy
 - ✓ Adipose tissue storage form of fat (mainly triglycerides), could produce about 3500 kcal as energy
 - ✓ Important source of fuel during illness and food restriction, and major energy source for muscle work
- Organ protection
- Temperature regulator
- Insulation: a substance composed largely of fatty tissues, called myelin, cover nerve cells. This covering provided electrical insulation that allows for transmission of nerve impulses.
- Where does the digestion of lipids mainly occur?
Digestion of lipids occurs mainly in the small intestine
Fat as a Nutrient in the Body: Digestion
 - Mouth
 - Primary fat digestive process is mechanical, inasmuch as teeth masticate fatty food.
 - Glands of the tongue produce fat-splitting enzyme (lingual lipase), released with saliva.
 - Stomach
