

Demystifying Reflection: A Study of Pedagogical Strategies That Encourage Reflective Journal Writing

ELIZABETH SPALDING AND ANGENE WILSON

University of Kentucky

Reflection is a mysterious concept to many of the students who enter our graduate-level, secondary teacher education program at a large, Southeastern university. Although all already hold degrees in their subject areas and many have extensive life and work experience, few have written—or perhaps even thought—reflectively during their academic careers (King & Kitchener, 1994). The purpose of this study was to identify pedagogical strategies that helped preservice secondary teachers improve their reflective thinking via journal writing during the 1st semester of a yearlong professional program. We found that no single pedagogical strategy was best and that students responded differently to different strategies. These preservice teachers benefited from spending class time on defining, discussing, and viewing models of reflection. Overall, personalized feedback on their journals and their relationships with their instructors were most important in helping them grow. We must actively teach and model reflective skills in a variety of ways if we are to demystify reflection.

When the requirement of weekly reflective journal writing is introduced in the first weeks of the yearlong program, many students express puzzlement and dismay. When they hand in their first journals after a week of immersion in a high school, some remark ruefully, "I hope this is what you want."
