

Respiration

All living cells need to respire to release energy. Energy is needed by organisms to help them move, grow and make new substances to help them stay alive.

Respiration normally requires oxygen and so it is called aerobic (with air) respiration. It is a series of chemical reactions which can be summarised in a word equation:

Glucose and oxygen are the reactants. Carbon dioxide and water are the products. Energy is released but it is not a chemical substance so we can either miss it out of the equation or put it in brackets.

Glucose is supplied by the digestion of carbohydrates. It is carried around the body dissolved in the plasma of the blood. The blood travels through blood vessels and is pumped by the heart. The heart and the blood vessels form the circulatory system.

The oxygen is absorbed from the air by the lungs. The lungs are part of the breathing system.
