

Peer Pressure among Teenagers

Peer pressure among teenagers is witnessed in almost all circles, with effects such as sexually transmitted diseases, increased murder cases, and unintentional injury or driving under the influence of alcohol. These are harmful indicators of health associated with many teenagers around the globe (Karakos, 2014). Indeed, these adverse effects can have dire consequences on the lives of these youths, especially regarding how they behave. Part of the increased changed behavior is that most of these teens are in their trial stage, where there is increased curiosity to experience different societal elements, which can have adverse effects.

For instance, most of the teenagers like to have their way with less need for patience and caution, which leads to high-risk behaviors (Gioia, 2017). Moreover, friends, teachers, and the extended families play significant roles during this critical stage, in that they attempt to shape the direction of the teenagers while still recognizing that they need their freedom to enjoy life and experience happy moments with no curfews or strict restrictions (Gioia, 2017).

However, it is worth discussing the influence of peer groups in the lives of teenagers and the impact on their behavior patterns, as a way of understanding the dynamics and uncovering possible remedies to the situation. Peer pressure linked with behavioral problems includes copying the way other members of the group dress, eat, socialize, and even behave. For instance, the influence is more prevalent when illegal or immoral elements are involved such as sexual relations, illicit activities like committing crimes, violence, dealing and consuming drugs and other substances, and many other concepts. Indeed, these issues occur during late childhood and through the teenage years of many youths (Somons-Morton & Farhat, 2012).

For instance, many teenagers engage in alcohol and drug abuse based on social pressure. Ideally, consuming alcohol and drugs makes parties merrier, holidays more enjoyable, and weekends more relaxing and social. In another context, the imitation of things done by peers may be the beginning of behavior such as seeing friends taking alcohol and engaging in sexual relations. As stated earlier, the teenage stage is a curious and experimental stage, where youths try things done by their peers to fit into groups and be considered cool.

Indeed, the group of peers may become an ideal alternative and impact attitudes and behavior as well as offering considerable societal preparation for engagement (Karakos, 2014).

Statement of the Problem

On one side, the presence of friends permits a person to share emotions and different experiences and to learn about how to resolve problems. On the other hand, lack of friends causes social isolation and limits social connections, with fewer chances for making new relations and communicatin
