Exam 1 Review Sheet

Chapter 1 (and lecture)

Werner's longitudinal study—methods, results (nature and nurture), resilient children

- 30 year-long study following development of about 700 Hawaiian children
- Tested for the effects of nature and nurture
- Methods included:
 - Examining birth records for complications
 - Interviews and family observation at ages 1 and 10
 - Kept track of child IQ, criminal records, and performance in school
- Results:
 - Children who experienced complications at birth more likely to have later life complications, such as lower academic performance and higher involvement in deviance
 - Children who experienced good rearing had way fewer complications
 - Only children who had bad rearing experienced consistent bad outcomes
 - SOME resilient children were able to overcome bad rearing and birth complications

Child court testimony—interviewers with preconceptions of what happened

- Research study had children play game similar to Simon Says in which they touched parts of their own and other children's bodies
- An interviewer given both accurate and false information interviewed children about their experiences
 - Preconceived ideas of what happened in the child's experience was found to influence the interviewers questions/methods
- If child's account of experience was different to what the interviewer had been told, they might ask the child if they are "sure"
 - Child tended to question their memory and corroborate interviewer's beliefs
- Children also easily influenced to "remember" events that never happened if interviewer asked them
- Conclusion: children are easily influenced to recall different versions of events or events that never occurred in the first place

Tabula rasa

- The absence of preconceived notions; a clean slate
- In children, the idea that nurture is more influential than nature.
- Child development largely reflects the nurture provided by the child's parents and the broader society. The most important goal of child-rearing is the growth of character. To build children's character, parents need to set good examples of honesty, stability, and gentleness. They also need to avoid indulging the child, especially early in life.

Romanian orphans—timing of experience

- Idea that children raised in orphanages would do better than if they were raised in a family in bad conditions.
