Powers of Two Edwin A. Valentijn, 2021-04-13 Is everything Information This is a tantalizing question which emerges in modern physics life sciences astronomy and in today's information and technology driven society In Powers of Two expert authors undertake a unique expedition in words and images throughout the world and scales of information The story resembles in a way the classic Powers of Ten journeys through space from us to the macro and the micro worlds However by following Powers of Two through the world of information a completely different and timely paradigm unfolds Every power of two 1 2 4 8 tells us a different story starting from the creation of the very first bit at the Big Bang and the evolution of life through 50 years of computational science and finally into deep space describing the information in black holes and even in the entire universe and beyond All this to address one question Is our universe made of information In this book we experience the Information Universe in nature and in our society and how information lies at the very foundation of our understanding of the Universe From the Foreword by Robbert Dijkgraaf This book is in many ways a vastly extended version of Shannon's one page blueprint It carries us all the way to the total information content of the Universe And it bears testimony of how widespread the use of data has become in all aspects of life Information is the connective tissue of the modern sciences Undoubtedly future generations will look back at this time so much enthralled by Big Data and quantum computers as beholden to the information metaphor But that is exactly the value of this book With its crisp descriptions and evocative illustrations it brings the reader into the here and now at the very frontier of scientific research including the excitement and promise of all the outstanding questions and future discoveries
