

In the story "The Adventure of the Solitary Cyclist," Watson had attempted to help Holmes in investigating the case but failed. This was mainly because he lacked an imaginative approach. For example, he asks a London estate agent residing in a particular country about the case. According to Holmes, he would have gone and listened to gossip from people in the area. Doyle also points out that Watson is guileless and hence he is not a proper detective. In the story Valley of Fear, Sherlock argues that Watson has a strain which he calls "pawky humor", though in nature he is straightforward, whereas Sherlock is considered to be devious and secretive (Doyle & Doyle, 1930).

Though he could not master the deductive methods of Holmes, Watson is an acute man and could follow Holmes' reasoning. In "The Adventure of the Norwood Builder," Sherlock Holmes contends that Hector McFarlane was "a solicitor, a bachelor, an asthmatic and a Freemason." Watson also comments in the narration role: "Familiar as I was with my friend's methods, it was not difficult for me to follow his deductions and to observe the untidiness of attire, sheaf of legal papers, the watch-chain, and the breathing with which had prompted them." An episode similar to this also occurred in "The Adventure of the Devil's Foot," "The Adventure of the Solitary Cyclist," and "The Adventure of the Resident Patient."

It should be noted that despite their differences, Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson lived together and were complimentary companions. The fact that they had similarities and understood one another are the major reasons as to why they could comfortably stay together as a working pair.

Commentary:

The author does well to provide examples from sources such as from the author himself and from the books to help demonstrate the arguments in the essay. This particular example gives us a clear understanding of how Holmes regarded Watson.
