1. What is accounting?

Accounting is the process of documenting, compiling, evaluating, and reporting an organization's or business's financial transactions. It entails gathering financial activity data methodically, categorizing and organizing it, and then evaluating and disseminating the outcomes. Accounting helps management, creditors, investors, and other stakeholders make well-informed decisions by offering insights into the performance and financial health of a company.

Accounting serves as a method for capturing, analyzing, and summarizing an entity's transactions, with the term "entity" encompassing various business organizations. Initially, transactions find their record in "books of original entry." Following this, a thorough analysis is conducted, and the information is then transferred to ledgers. Ultimately, the transactions are condensed and presented in the form of financial statements.

One of the accountant's primary responsibilities involves quantifying an entity's revenue, expenditure, and, in the case of a business, its profit. Despite its apparent simplicity, this process entails theoretical and practical complexities, which we will explore in subsequent chapters.

2. Importance of Accounting on Business.

Accounting is crucial since it maintains an organized record of the financial data of the company. Users can compare historical data with current financial information by using up-to-date records. It allows consumers to evaluate a company's success over time with complete, consistent, and accurate records. Because accounting maintains an organized record of the financial data of the company, it is crucial. Users can compare previous financial data with current data by using up-to-date records. It lets users evaluate an organization's performance over time with complete, accurate, and consistent records.

It plays a key role in decision-making, performance evaluation, compliance with regulations, and building investor confidence. Accounting ensures financial transparency, aids in resource allocation, and facilitates effective business planning, ultimately contributing to the overall success and stability of a business.

3. Types of Accounting:

There are several types of accounting that range from auditing to the preparation of tax returns. Accountants tend to specialize in one of these fields, which leads to the different career tracks noted below.

i) Accounting for finances:

The goal of financial accounting is to create financial statements that give a summary of the state and performance of a business's finances over a given time frame.

External Reporting: The main purpose of it is to report externally to various stakeholders, including creditors, investors, regulators, and the general public.

Standards: Financial accounting is governed by International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) or Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP).

ii) Accounting for Managers:

Goal: The main focus of managerial accounting, often known as cost accounting, is to supply internal management with data for planning, control, and decision-making.

Internal Focus: It works with information that helps managers plan budgets, assess performance, and make operational decisions.
