

Interview Paper Structure

Introductory Section.

Write a catchy hook, reference, or quote that makes the reader want to explore further. Describe the essence of your story and familiarize the audience with the elaborated core values.

Thesis Statement.

Craft a sentence or two unveiling the focus of your interview paper. This part should be concise and highlight the purpose of the manuscript. It must also provide a proper link to the first body paragraph.

Body Section.

The longest part of the paper may contain several subheadings divided into paragraphs. Use them to present the outcomes of the experience. If you interviewed several subjects, dedicate a different segment to each by analyzing reasons and conclusions.

Summary.

End with a concluding section that wraps up the interviewee's most valid opinions. You might also depict your standpoints (which can contradict the speaker's attitude) arising from the provided responses.
