PRELIMINARY CHECKING PROCEDURE - CONTINUED (IF LINE PRESSURES WERE INITIALLY HIGH)

ENGINES WITH EGR VALVES

On some engines with Exhaust Gas Recirculation (EGR), the throttle is open enough to "blow" some fresh air to start the EGR valve to open. When the EGR valve opens, it tests gas valves the valve should check before valve would turn. When valve would turn, it is tested, the transmission line of pressure valve accordingly, and may go above the upper specification limit. For this reason, if high line pressures are obtained, proceed as follows:

1. Disconnect the EGR return line at the EGR valve and plug the return line.
2. Recheck line pressures as indicated in the Preliminary Checking Procedure Chart on page 5.
3. If high line pressures are still indicated, continue below.

ENGINES WITHOUT EGR VALVE OR IF HIGH LINE PRESSURES WERE OBTAINED WITH THE EGR VACUUM LINE PLUGGED

If high line pressures are experienced in vehicles without EGR or with EGR not plugged, it may be that the engine is not producing enough vacuum to lower transmission line pressure within specifications. The lower engine with vacuum control characteristics have lower engine vacuum than other port engine. To obtain line pressures suitable for evaluation, it is recommended that vacuum be applied to the manifold, using an external vacuum source such as a Bell-Morris 2-1/2" and 1/2" rated vacuum device or its equivalent. The test allows between periods of vacuum to be applied to the manifold so that corrected line pressures can be obtained for evaluation as follows:

manifold at the manifold and plug the return line.

1. Attach the hand operated vacuum device as shown on page 1 and apply 20" of vacuum.
2. Recheck line pressures according to the Preliminary Checking Procedure Chart, on page 5.
3. If line pressures are still high, proceed to the specific diagnostic chart that applies to the malfunction encountered.
4. If line pressures are normal with external vacuum applied, check engine vacuum and vacuum systems for leaks (See page 17).
