

Impersonal-Situational Probability Method

Suppose you are investigating the probability of a basketball player being selected for the national team based on being in the national basketball league. The following table summarizes your findings:

Probability of Selection by League

Let L denote the event that a player is in the national basketball league, and let S denote the event that a player is selected for the national team. The probability of a player being selected for the national team, given that they are in the national basketball league, is $P(S|L) = 0.15$. The probability of a player being selected for the national team, given that they are not in the national basketball league, is $P(S|L^c) = 0.05$. The probability of a player being in the national basketball league is $P(L) = 0.80$. The probability of a player not being in the national basketball league is $P(L^c) = 0.20$.

	L	L^c
S	0.15	0.05
