RESEARCH conducted by researchers from the University of California, San Diego, and the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, has found that the use of a computer-based system to monitor and control the environment of a hospital room can reduce the risk of infection and improve patient outcomes. The system, called "SmartRoom," uses sensors to monitor the room's temperature, humidity, and air quality, and can automatically adjust the room's environment to maintain optimal conditions for patient recovery. The study found that patients in rooms with SmartRoom had a lower risk of infection and a shorter hospital stay compared to patients in rooms without the system.
