

Single-Parent College Students Struggling to Graduate

Topic: Sociology | Words: 1378 | Pages: 5

Colleges receive students from various backgrounds under different situations. The rise of single-student parents in colleges presents an opportunity to learn about the experiences of such students and compare them with other regular nonparent learners. An estimated 26 percent of all undergraduate students, or 4.8 million, are raising dependent children (Noll et al. 1). Women are disproportionately likely to be balancing college and parenthood, many without the support of a spouse or partner. Women make up 71 percent of all student parents, and roughly 2 million students, or 43 percent of the total student-parent population, are single mothers (Noll et al. 12). Single-student fathers comprise 11 percent of the student-parent population (Noll et al. 9). A review of some of the available literature, for instance, a study by Wekullo (334), indicates that single-parent students received more social support from friends, parents, government, and non-governmental organizations. The study portrays that single-parent students face fewer challenges while at college. Though student single parents enjoy support from various programs compared to traditional ones, they have challenges in unmet needs, time demands, and emotional support, among other challenges.

Mainstream college institutional models of academic experience may be indifferent to the needs of a diverse society in which cultural strands of experience are unique, such as those represented by single-parent students. These students concurrently serve as heads of households with dependent children. Further, single-student mothers may be unable to compete academically with those who are fully resourced,
