Flying Magazine, 1977-07 Cloud-Native 5G: Architecting Telecom with Kubernetes and AI 2025 Author:1- Veeresh Nunavath, uthor:2- Dr. Lalit Kumar, PREFACE In recent years the telecommunications industry has witnessed a profound transformation driven by the convergence of cloud native paradigms container orchestration and artificial intelligence Cloud Native 5G Architecting Telecom with Kubernetes and AI is born out of the recognition that tomorrow s networks must be agile scalable and intelligent enough to meet ever evolving demands from ultralow latency industrial automation to immersive augmented reality experiences Rather than simply applying legacy architectures to next generation radio access and core networks we now have the opportunity to reimagine every layer of the telecom stack through cloud native principles microservices declarative APIs immutable infrastructure continuous delivery and observability This book is intended as both a roadmap and a hands on guide for network architects DevOps engineers AI practitioners and decision makers who are charting a course toward fully software defined self optimizing 5G systems We begin by exploring the fundamental motivations for cloud native 5G the need to accelerate time to market dynamically scale resources optimize capital and operational expenditures and inject predictive intelligence into network operations From there we delve into the core building blocks of a cloud native

telecom stack Kubernetes as the orchestration substrate service meshes for secure and resilient communications and CI CD pipelines to automate deployments across distributed edge and regional clusters Artificial intelligence sits at the heart of the transformation In early chapters we introduce machine learning workflows tailored for network analytics how to collect cleanse and label telemetry at scale how to train and validate models that predict load detect anomalies and anticipate faults and how to deploy inference engines as lightweight microservices at the network edge Later sections demonstrate how reinforcement learning and closed loop control can enable networks to self tune parameters orchestrating spectrum allocation beamforming and load balancing in real time while minimizing human intervention As the reader progresses use cases will bring theory to life implementing cloud native network slicing to guarantee differentiated SLAs across diverse verticals leveraging AI driven traffic steering to optimize quality of experience in mobile broadband and ultra reliable low latency contexts and integrating open source 5G cores with commercial telco cloud platforms Each chapter balances conceptual clarity with code snippets architectural diagrams and references to leading projects offering practical guidance whether you re evaluating CNCF backed network function virtualization NFV frameworks or building proprietary AI pipelines We also address organizational considerations evolving teams toward DevTelco mindsets redefining release management and security practices for containerized network functions and fostering collaboration between data scientists software engineers and network operators The book concludes with a forward looking perspective on 6G trends how terahertz communications distributed intelligence and digital twins may further disrupt the telecom landscape and where open source communities can drive innovation Whether you re an engineer tasked with migrating legacy network functions into Kubernetes clusters a researcher designing novel AI based management algorithms or an executive charting your company s strategic roadmap this volume aims to equip you with both the conceptual frameworks and the hands on techniques necessary to architect resilient scalable and intelligent 5G systems The journey toward cloud native telco is complex but with Kubernetes and AI as your allies it is also the most exciting frontier in digital infrastructure today Authors
