Should Kids Be Allowed to Become Influencers?

Evidence-Based Questions

Kids Should be Allowed to Become Influencers

Not that long ago, kids of all ages looked up to, talked about, and aspired to be celebrities. From posters plastered all over their walls to writing letters to them, hoping they might notice and respond. The world has changed, but kids' desire to have someone has never faded. What has changed, however, is the method young people take to show their admiration of celebrities. Instead of celebrity posters on walls, adolescents are following Social Media Influencers, copying their style, personality, and goals. These influencers are different than celebrities because, besides their sometimes millions of followers, they are "regular" people. With influencers being the new dream, many kids have found themselves wondering if that is an attainable goal for them. Many of the people are kids, who are new to navigating the world of Social Media. Kids should be allowed to become influencers because the benefits outweigh the downsides.

Kids spend much of their time on Social Media. They are bombarded with influencers creating content and prying on kids as their target audience. Unfortunately, many of these influencers have unethical goals, like convincing kids to ask their parents to spend money on items that may not be age-appropriate, to even being convinced they need them so bad that it would be best to buy them
