

Appendix 1 – Microbiology Laboratory Techniques

Safe use of Bunsen,
Aseptic handling of wire loop and straight wire,
Safety rules for Aseptic Technique for broth cultures,
Streak-dilution technique for single colonies: Whole plate method and Half-plate method,
Wet mounts,
Heat Fixed Smear.

Safe use of Bunsen Burner.

Bunsen Burners are frequently used in the microbiology laboratory. It is essential that the Bunsen be used in the correct manner to avoid hazards. You will be instructed in the safe operation of the Bunsen by the laboratory staff. Take particular note of the extra risks when working with or near flammable solutions while using a Bunsen. Also take particular note of the correct use of the Bunsen gas valve. The Bunsen gas valve can be moved to the ON or the OFF position but should never be left "HALF ON" or "HALF OFF".

Aseptic handling of wire loop and straight wire (D. Townsend - modified)

Wire loops and straight wires, which are made of a special nickel-chromium alloy are used for the routine transfer of microbial cultures. This alloy does not corrode and heats up and cools down very quickly. Prior to any aseptic transfer the wire is heated to incinerate any contaminating microbes and after each transfer the wire is heated again to destroy any remaining microbes. The wires are stored inverted in a rack. There should be at least two of each so that one can be used while the other is cooling down.

1. Turn on the Bunsen at the main gas valve then light the pilot flame. Turn on the main gas flame and make sure the flame is at its hottest setting by allowing maximum air to enter from its base.

2. Hold the wire almost vertical with the hand above the flame and the wire (uncharged) located in the hottest part of the flame (see diagram). Heat for about 15 seconds until the wire glows red along its length. Return the loop to the rack and allow to cool before using.
3. If the loop is heavily charged with a culture heat the wire above the Bunsen flame until the fluid has dried and then plunge it into the hottest part of the flame to complete the sterilization. Rapid heating of the wire in the Bunsen flame will cause rapid boiling of the fluid and splatter the microbes into the atmosphere creating an aerosol of microbes. These aerosols may contain potentially dangerous microbes, which may enter the respiratory system.
