William West: Dealing with Disasters

Abstract

Chlorophyllous matter in their younger chloroplasts can absorb light of wavelengths less than 400 nm and transfer the light energy to photosynthetic pigments. Chlorophylls absorb light of the wavelength spectrum in the visible spectrum and transfer the absorbed energy to various other photosynthetic pigments, such as carotenoids. These carotenoids then transfer energy to chlorophylls, and then light energy is used to drive photosynthesis. Thus, light is the energy source for photosynthesis. Chlorophylls absorb light energy and transfer it to the photosynthetic system. The photosynthetic system then uses the energy to drive the photosynthetic process. The energy is used to drive the photosynthetic process, and the energy is used to drive the photosynthetic process.
